Sepsis and trauma: immune mechanisms underlying the induction of multiple organ failure. Sepsis is the leading cause of morbidity and mortality after trauma. This review summarizes the current understanding of the immunological and cellular basis of postinjury sepsis. Over the past decade, it has become clear that the development of sepsis after trauma is a complex process that includes both local and systemic responses. Local tissue damage, leading to increased levels of tumor necrosis factor, interleukin-1, and other proinflammatory cytokines, results in the recruitment of neutrophils and monocytes and the release of chemokines and other mediators that in turn amplify the immune and inflammatory responses. Systemic changes include the release of nitric oxide, activation of nuclear factor-kappaB, and the production of matrix metalloproteases that degrade the connective tissue matrix and basement membrane, all of which result in the loss of capillary patency, leading to the characteristic distributive pattern of multiple organ failure seen in patients after trauma. The pathophysiological changes in trauma-related sepsis result in the death of peripheral organs and central nervous system injury that contribute to the mortality observed in these patients.r. -2*r - 1 Collect the terms in 45 + 5 + 7*v - 40 - 8
