R11i v2 for SEO (SEM) - 5.4.D.C. to lead Amtrak project to 'replace' century-old service station It was everything you hoped a bus station would be: spare, unimpressive and not terrible looking. Kemper Pike station, the downtown service stop, once served millions of riders. But it has been shuttered for years. |

Kamil Krzaczynski/for DCist That's the ticket for a new Amtrak bus station at the southwest corner of K Street and Connecticut Avenue NW.

A proposed complex of five bus shelters, parking garages, and a low-level bus station dubbed "Red Line" is the latest in a series of planning efforts to address the metro's inability to accommodate the fast-growing population of government employees in Southwest D.C. According to a report from the District's transportation commission, the D.C. government has about 3,000 full-time employees who prefer to bike and take public transportation to work. It's a problem that has only intensified as additional areas of the city become "enterprise areas" (those densely populated by government agencies), according to the report. "Increasing numbers of residents in Southwest D.C. are choosing to work, live and play in the downtown area rather than further drive up costs to live in the ward," reads the report. The government's presence in Washington has traditionally been concentrated downtown, in the blocks surrounding the White House, and in Foggy Bottom and Tenleytown, two historically black communities. To get from Foggy Bottom to Tenleytown, for example, one would now have to drive past the White House (and through the heart of the District's minority population) to reach the neighborhoods where government workers live. In the four decades following the D.C. public bus system's inception, "the geography and characteristics of the employment base have remained the same, and the fastest mode of travel is the private automobile," the report notes.
